Who he is: Fourth-generation coffee farmer who in 2014 decided to stop selling to others and start processing his own coffee. What began as a small natural micro-mill has become one of the most technically rigorous and creative operations in Costa Rica's Los Santos zone, run daily by Martín, his wife Olga, and their children.

Brief history: Don Martín has worked in coffee his entire life, but 2014 marked a turning point — conventional farming wasn't delivering results, so he built La Chumeca from scratch. The micro-mill has five different parcels across Los Santos, each worked separately with full traceability, generating a variety of lots and distinct flavors. Around 25 different lots are processed each year, all monitored by Brix degrees, temperature, and pH to guarantee quality and replicability.
